Remote Neural Monitoring

Dear Editor: I find your articles compelling reading; interesting and informative. I am a firm believer in alien life-forms and their contact with us, but your magazine has broadened my perceptions of not only what is 'out there' but what other secrets the world governments are withholding from the populace.

Your article on the use of RNM by the NSA was one I found particularly startling, even to me, and I always thought I had a very broad-minded opinion about such technologies and the agencies that use them. This technology has frightening ramifications for every person on the planet: a perverse invasion of privacy and basic human rights. The fact that other individuals can actually see and hear what their subjects are doing is scary enough, but that they could actually influence the subject by affecting their aural, visual and motor senses is truly nightmarish stuff.

In finishing, I ask who is accountable for this technology and what can we do about suppressing its use?

Yours sincerely, Stephen H.,

Poles Apart

Dear Mr Roads: Felt compelled to comment on a Letter to the Editor, entitled "Nukes Blasted Ozone Layer?", featured in the last issue of NEXUS [vol. 3, no. 3].

Geophysical Year 1957 was a grand pretence—planned to excuse extraordinary US Arctic/Antarctic activity of that period. Involving near 5,000 naval personnel aboard submarines, innumerable surface vessels and aircraft, the true object of their endeavours was to verify/clarify certain discoveries made by one Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd.

While America did indeed detonate nuclear devices over Antarctica, they were hardly interested in studying the Van Allen belt (as if they would have hoped to learn anything through such a technique!) but were in fact inflicting 'electromagnetic pulse' (yes, they were already well aware of its effect) upon those parts of both poles enigmatically known as 'areas of inaccessibility'—momentarily rendering ineffective what so many polar explorers have only ever taken to be inexplicably severe white-out conditions of dense 'cloud-bank'. The resulting data, obtained by way of satellites' geographical observations, no doubt proved conclusive as they were classified.

That said, it is only appropriate to mention some Russian findings—specifically, that the magnetic 'poles' are not any single or wandering points but circular zones of some 900 kilometres in diameter. To quote their official documentation of the period: "Exploration and research have shown that an enormous region of the Earth's surface and correspondingly large realms of the unknown may be brought within the compass of human understanding in a very few years."—certainly suggestive, if hopelessly naive in its assumption of government-to-public disclosure. Of course, the governments involved have had it relatively easy keeping what is commonly (and somewhat inadequately) labelled "The Hollow Earth Theory" from people's attention. The suggestion that there actually exist physical openings at either pole, which just happen 'coincidentally' to correspond with atmospheric anomalies above, is simply too improbable to possibly be true—right? Yeah, right!

The Yank government's supposedly imminent (and clearly well-rehearsed) 'tell-all' on the existence and origin of these precious 'Grey' ETs is bound to appease the mainstream 'UFO-aware' crowd, but I, for one, won't be holding my breath in anticipation of being given the true truth which is in there...

Sound Wave Energy Success

Dear Editor: I visited your site and want to share a new technology with you regarding the power of sound frequencies created by Sound Wave Energy. SWE is an holistic approach to heal the physical, mental, emotional and spiritual aspects of the person. Its purpose is to bring the individual back into a state of harmony and balance, through the application of vibration and resonance by the use of audiotapes. But forget that and listen instead to the miracle my life went through.

I was born with a deficiency in my growth hormones, and as a result I had to take pills for the rest of my life under the threat that if I ever was to stop taking them I would become nothing more than a zombie. I must confess that I have done so (stopped taking my medication) two or three times. The results were quite ugly.

As an X-ray technician, my mother has always been on the lookout for alternative medicine since she realised that conventional medicine was not working for me. I must have tried tons of different approaches to heal myself: some worked a little, some didn't work at all. Two years ago, my mom called me in Montreal and told me that she had found something amazing that could work for me. I told her, abused and desperate, that I was not interested any more. But when I came to visit her in Placitas, New Mexico, she started playing some tapes with different types of frequencies.

Meanwhile, we visited a psychic woman in Santa Fe who insulted me by saying that I had a gift of Love. As soon as she pronounced those words, I replied, mad as hell, that I was the person with the least love in the world and that I hated everyone beginning with myself! But after a while, listening to the tapes, a true miracle occurred: I started crying, my heart was slowly but surely starting to bloom like a flower, realising the divinity in myself. Consciousness arose wide open in me. Now, when I look back at this event in my life, I embrace it with love and compassion, saying that if I had to live through it again I would because it made me into what I am right now: a powerful and loving being seeking to grow and to be one again with all that is. Of course, I don't take pills any more: I'm the healthy, happy conductor of a joyous life!

All my love, Robert L., Montreal,

(PS: If you feel that what I have said is coming from my heart, do yourself a favour and take a look at the Sound Wave Energy site: <http://www.frontier.net/~swe/>)

Prophetic Comments

Dear Sir: Re NEXUS April/May, the predictions of Mitar Tarabich appear to be correct in regard to the Balkans but not in regard to other regions of Europe. Example: "In the beginning, Russia will not wage war..."

Before it was invaded itself, Russia did wage war, however. On 17th July 1940 (the same year in which Germany invaded Czechoslovakia), the USSR invaded the Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. In Estonia's case, this was breaking the mutual assistance pact of 1939 and implementing the Molotov-Ribbentrop secret agreement to divide up Europe between the two major powers.

Tallinn was bombed heavily and, on 14th June 1941, there followed the genocide of tens of thousands of Baltic citizens. By 8th July 1941, German forces were in the north, remaining in occupation for three years. The accommodations made by the governments of that period were in resistance to Soviet terror and to regain control of their own states, although the manner in which the accommodation was effected remains strongly criticised to this day by Balts at home and abroad.

Historically, Russia had not previously occupied the Baltic areas as long as the British had controlled India. However, it was determined to retain Baltic ports under its control.

The most strategic of these remains Tallinn, which is almost ice-free in winter, unlike the Russian naval base of Kronstadt near St Petersburg. That is, if in Russian hands, Tallinn can become the base for nuclear submarines with access to the North Sea and the Atlantic itself, leaving Western European cities and even Washington and New York very vulnerable.

Tarabich's strong focus on his own people is understandable. I interpret his reference to "the little man of a nation far in the north" as referring to Alexander Solzhenitsyn. But it might just as easily be Toomas Paul, a Lutheran pastor of Tallinn who has gained fame as an orator and an historian.

Yours faithfully, Astrid K.,

Animal Products Labelling

Dear Sir: "Mad cow disease" has highlighted once again how our individual right of choice is being eroded.

I have chosen to be a vegetarian, both for health and spiritual reasons, and yet, like so many other people, I am becoming more and more alarmed by the hidden use of dead carcasses. Not content with chicken or beef stock in so-called vegetable soups, rennet in most cheeses and eggs in the strangest places, we are now told that gelatin (which is derived from skin and bones) is contained in a huge range of everyday commodities from lollies to vitamin capsules. Its presence in a popular brand of 'so-called' fruit yoghurt astounds me.

... more Letters to the Editor

NB: Please keep letters to approx. 100-150 words in length. Ed.

Legislation was necessary to enforce the disclosure of colourings and preservatives. Surely now is time to insist that food containing animal products also be marked.

The claim that 'contents' are shown on packaging is not valid. I doubt that the average shopper would know that the preservative sodium nitrate (252) comes from animal waste. And there is no way to tell whether one of the many antioxidants, emulsifiers, colours, anti-caking and flavour enhancers have been obtained from animal or vegetable origin. Examples range from 120 to 1520 and include xanthophylls (161), lecithin (322), sucrose ester (473), etc., etc.

I appeal to other people to voice your concerns, petition your elected representatives, to demand a "Free from Animal Products" label on all clean products. If you are aware of the power of homeopathy and aromatherapy, then this should also include soaps, shampoos and toothpaste.

You do have the right to know what you are buying, even if you do not personally care.

Yours sincerely, Philip H., Toodyay, WA, Australia.

'You Pay' TV

Dear Editor: How many people know that their Galaxy box has smart card capabilities? Indeed it does. It has dormant technology that gives it the capacity to be linked to smart cards so you can shop, bank and whatever from home. It has the ability to be linked to systems so you can, for example, order theatre tickets via the smart card system and a little printer will produce your ticket right in your lounge room, all paid for.

What you watch, what you buy, what you spend your 'credits' on, where you go, everything... The beautiful thing is that people are so naive that they pay to be monitored and controlled. Guess that's why it's Pay TV—boy, do you pay!

And if you do have Galaxy and are wondering why the TV you turned off last night is on in the morning, don't worry; it's just the satellite waking your TV up with its daily instructions. You see, if they want your TV on then they will turn it on. Too bad if you want it off.

Search for Intelligent Life?

Dear Duncan: A recent newspaper report states that signals picked up by the Parkes (NSW) radio telescope were found to be emanating from the microwave in the staff canteen.

Are we to believe that this high-tech, multimillion-dollar marvel of technology has been foiled by a humble microwave, or is this a typical attempt to debunk a genuine unidentified signal?

Am I becoming paranoid through reading too many NEXUS mags?

Regards, Ian L., Tauranga, New Zealand.

Genetically-Inoculated Food

Dear Duncan: You might be interested to hear about some new techniques in genetic engineering with fruit and vegetables. This information comes from today's Sydney Daily Telegraph-Mirror (13 March). The article is entitled "Super fruit good for you, but multi-coloured".

Not only can they alter the colour of fruit so you can have a "red banana" or a "multi-coloured tomato" (quite a novelty really, and being in the restaurant business I can say that things like this could make a very well-presented side salad); however, there are other ramifications.

The article goes on to say that it is possible for the fruit to be genetically engineered to also include extra vitamins, which is a good idea, but get this! It's also possible for them to include drugs in the fruit to prevent disease and, I quote, "possibly making inoculations a thing of the past".

Many times I have read in your magazine about the possibility of inoculations being potentially disastrous, but what will be the ramifications of this? Hopefully "they" will not be able to put this through any legislation or, more to the point, hopefully it goes before legislation. The people have a right to know.

Yours sincerely, John P., Cooma, NSW, Australia.

Vitamin C Conspiracy

Dear Duncan: History repeats itself, ref. your short piece in Global News, NEXUS vol. 3, no. 3, about the French court ruling that vitamin C is a drug when over 100 mg per day is used. They keep on trying. In the late '70s, the best book ever written on vitamin C disappeared worldwide with quite indecent speed. It is titled The Healing Factor: Vitamin C Against Disease, by Dr Irwin Stone, and as far as I know there are about four copies left in this country, and possibly the same in USA (it was printed in New York). The trouble was that when you had vitamin C you did not need to use orthodox drugs. I guess someone in Europe is trying to instigate a similar scenario there. Dr Glen Dettman and Dr Archie Kalokerinos wrote their excellent book partly because of the disappearance of the one mentioned.

Carry on the good work. Trouble is, each time NEXUS arrives, another illusion goes down the drain, and I haven't too many left.

Yours sincerely, Pat C., Maldon, Victoria, Australia.

Urine Therapy vs Skin Cancer

Dear Duncan: I write you this communication with particular reference to the matter of cancer.

Two years ago, a small sore appeared on my right inside lower arm. It was very small and, at the time, appeared quite insignificant. However, within three to four weeks the sore started itching, accompanied by a burning sensation. Within the following six months it had noticeably enlarged.

I later self-diagnosed it as possibly cancer and kept an eye on it. It continued to enlarge and I consequently visited my doctor. He confirmed it was cancer and advised that it would require surgical removal as soon as possible. From my recent studies of cancer cases and alternative medicine regarding cancer cures, I was most reluctant about surgery in view of the fact that, in many cases, surgery has only served to aggravate the area in question on the body where it has been performed, thus weakening the region for further later invasion to take place.

However, my health did decline somewhat as time passed on, and, by Christmas 1995, this cancer sore was now accompanied by yet another one in close proximity which grew at an alarming rate and became in a short time linked with the original outbreak. Margaret nagged me incessantly to get the surgery done, and by the New Year my resolve was weakening along with my health.

It was following the release of your February-March 1996 issue in which you featured the "Urine Therapy" article by Martha M. Christy, which I read several times, that I decided to give this therapy a go myself, albeit in a slightly modified approach. If this brave lady could annihilate all her health dramas in this way, why should I not try?

I immediately devised a way whereby I could apply the urine in an ongoing way so that the core of the cancer was saturated continuously with fresh urine. (Margaret threatened to divorce me!) I first of all opened my diary to Saturday 27th January '96 and entered, "First treatment started." All treatments and noticeable results were entered from then on. On Wednesday 28th February '96, entry reads, "Growths completely healed." Saturday 9th March reads, "Area of growth now difficult to discern/sec." 16th March reads, "Now there is no trace of where growth originally existed, i.e., no scar." The actual healing time was 32 days.

Margaret and I went down to the doctor's and showed him the arm. He and his nurses could not find any trace of the cancer and kept rubbing the hairs of my arm away to try to find it. One of the nurses at the clinic has become an avid reader of and subscriber to NEXUS Magazine and, at the time, although the doctor demanded to know what self-treatment I had 'taken', neither Margaret nor I would divulge that the application of urine did the trick, but the nurse in question (NEXUS reader) stood at the back quietly smiling to herself. Later she said when no one was about, "You tried that urine therapy, I'll bet! You old devil; trust you!" The nurse agreed to bring her issue of NEXUS into the inner sanctum of the clinic and leave it in conspicuous places in the hope that one of the doctors might just pick it up, read it and come to some sort of conclusion on their own. We are still awaiting some feedback news from 'our nurse on the inside'.

Margaret and I still keep a monitor on the entire arm, but it seems remarkable that just one outbreak of cancer on just one area of the surface of the body can actually drain one's strength and affect one's general health the way it did with myself. I have, since the treatment, experienced a remarkable improvement in strength, health and general well-being and, yes, quite a wonderful success story.

Duncan, I feel personally indebted to this brave lady, and you have my permission to give her a copy of this personal authentic experience.

Kind regards to all at NEXUS,
Robert Adams, Whakatane, New Zealand.
